[10]

When values in a society are seen deteriorating, it is only right for the law to step in. In the last 25 years, the elderly population in India has doubled. The number of cases of neglect of the elderly population in India by their children is also on the rise. In addition, attacks on senior citizens living alone have multiplied. This is of serious concern for a nation.

Now fortunately there are laws which make it legally binding for the children to look after their ageing parents. Ideally, children, on their own, should feel moral obligation of taking care of their parents, who have done such a lot for them. But in cases where this does not happen, the law alone can guarantee protection for the elderly parents. No doubt, the parents would silently accept the thankless behaviour of their children rather than pursue a legal battle; but this thinking has now changed. The younger generation must also realize that the experience and support of the senior can be very fruitful.

- a) What must the younger generation realize?
- b) What are seen deteriorating?
- c) Which thinking has now to be changed?
- d) When has the elderly population in India doubled?
- e) Why should children take care of their parents?
- f) What have multiplied?
- g) Who should feel the moral obligation to look after their parents?
- h) What can the law alone guarantee?
- i) Where is the number of cases of neglect of elderly people on the rise?
- j) Who can not pursue a legal battle?
